QUESTION 2

Two rival companies, X and Y, surprised everyone with a creative and unexpected collaboration in France. They swapped their logos on Instagram display pictures and even showcased each other's branding at their physical stores, sparking buzz and public interest. As part of this quirky partnership, they launched a co-branded product called 'BFF'. To celebrate the collaboration, employees from both companies danced to the tune of song "Why Can't We Be Friends?".

QUESTION 4

Have you ever seen a brand deliberately try to destroy the excitement of customers to use their own product? Well, Brand X did just that in 2014. They launched a website called Y, which was entirely designed to reduce users' interest in engaging with X's product—at least on the surface.

Surprisingly, this wasn't a careless move—it was a calculated risk based on a psychological study that found Y can actually increase curiosity and engagement. The website featured bold and direct videos for popular products, yet it drew massive attention, garnering over 9 million visits in just 5 weeks.

QUESTION 5

This marketing campaign by Brand X, titled "Forced Packs," may initially seem like a blunder, but in reality, it carried a powerful message aimed at Indian parents—especially those like Farhan's father. Instead of using its traditional packaging, Brand X chose to place its product inside unconventional containers such as tissue boxes, ketchup bottles, and cooking oil cans, and distributed them across various supermarkets. When parents came across these oddly packaged products, their curiosity was piqued. Upon picking them up, they read the message:

"These X packs were forced to be something they were never meant to be—just like millions of children who are pushed away from their natural potential."

The campaign struck an emotional chord with parents and enhanced the brand's image by delivering a meaningful social message.

QUESTION 6

Launched on June 2, 2002, the drink X was introduced by Y, a carbonated beverage brand owned by Keurig Dr Pepper. X was designed to be the exact opposite of Y in nearly every aspect — including caffeine content, drink color, bottle color, and even the name itself. It featured a strong Z flavor, whereas Y had only a mild version of the same. However, due to intense competition from Coca-Cola and Pepsi, X was discontinued in 2005.

QUESTION 8

In 1973, Company X—best known for selling cars—made an unexpected move by entering the food business, selling hot dogs and sausages in supermarkets. The unusual decision came after employees, who loved the food served in the company cafeteria, demanded it be made available outside the office. In fact, when the company once tried to remove it from the menu, it sparked a strike among the workers.

What began as an internal perk turned into a customer favorite. Ironically, X now sells more hot dogs (8.5 million) than cars (5.2 million) by volume annually.

QUESTION 9

Have you ever had the experience of shopping in a store, only to be mistaken for an employee and asked about the products? Well, X took note of this and launched a campaign called "Wear Yellow and Get a Special Discount." During this campaign, customers who wore yellow shirts were encouraged to assist other shoppers using X's mobile app. In return, they received small discounts. This creative strategy allowed X to cut down on staffing costs while offering customers a unique and engaging experience. Identify X.

ANSWER 10

What happened: Speaking at University of Washington, Bill Gates said: “Although 3 million computers get sold each year in China, people don’t pay for our software. Someday they will, though, and as long as they are going to steal it, we want them to steal ours. They’ll get sort of addicted, and then we’ll somehow figure out how to collect sometime in the next decade.” Gates & Co took a stand that piracy wasn’t all that bad. Their reasoning: if people were pirating the software, they were at least using it, and this could someday translate into real market share once these countries developed. As China got richer, computers got cheaper and Microsoft lowered its prices for operating systems. Today, after a few decades of piracy, Microsoft is the market leader in China.

In 2013, Sony released a fully waterproof headphone and MP3 player combo, X, specifically designed for swimmers. However, sales were initially sluggish, as customers found it hard to believe the product was truly waterproof just by looking at it on store shelves. To solve this, Sony came up with a brilliant marketing idea—they packaged X inside a water bottle filled with water and placed these bottles in vending machines at gyms and swimming centers, directly targeting their ideal customers. This clever strategy led to a significant boost in sales.
